Africa in Comparative Perspective

Swiss Society of African Studies

Geneva | 15-17 November 2018

This conference seeks to debate the social construction of order and legitimacy during and after violent conflict. It focuses on political orders put in place by armed groups, their strategies to legitimise their very existence as movements as well as their claim to power, and on the extent to which they strive and manage to institutionalise their military power and transform it into political domination.

Recent literature has provided important insights into the organisational structures of armed groups, the emergence of alternative forms of social order in war-affected zones, as well as into the relationships between territorial control and the use of violence. Taken together these studies build a new, 're-politicised' narrative of state-society relations during violent conflict. However, scant attention has been paid to how relations and institutions of governance that were developed in areas controlled by armed groups fit into long-term dynamics of state formation through armed conflict. Moreover, much of the literature on the peace-building/state-building nexus still relies on a normative and prescriptive concept of states as structures rather than as processes, and on the idea that states are the product of conscious policies aimed at constructing the institutional infrastructure of governance rather than historical formations. We argue that states cannot be engineered, but are the results of long-lasting historical processes including phases of violence. Accordingly, civil wars need to be seen as part and parcel of historical processes of state formation and not as the expression of states' inability to maintain their monopoly over the use of violence, or as the result of their 'collapse' and 'failure'. A processual, bottom-up approach to capturing formations of statehood provides for a better understanding of legitimate institutions and their formation.

Based on this critical perspective on the politics of government in war zones, the conference will follow three interconnected main lines of inquiry:

1. M*anufacturing consent.* What kind of narratives do armed groups construct to legitimise their military actions and shore up popular consent? How do rebel movements and other armed groups build their social base and garner support for their cause and what narratives do they produce to legitimise their military actions in order to counter the negative effects of the 'shadow of violence' (Schlichte) cast by warfare?

2. Institutionalising rule. To which degree do armed movements in different socio-political environments engage in the development of a system of civilian rule and a bureaucratic apparatus? How does military control by armed groups translate (or not) into civilian political institutions in times of war and what, if anything, distinguishes wartime governance from other forms of governance? Here, we posit that the ability of armed movements to institutionalise their power is strongly influenced by the kind of state-society relationship that characterised social life prior to conflict in the areas under their control, and we therefore look at how the government of people in times of war relates to other sources of power (traditional or religious authorities, remnants of the state administration, local, national and international NGOs, etc.).

3. The wartime fabric of post-war state domination. Engaging with what we see as a blind spot in the literature on governance in times of war, and especially in the emerging sub-field of 'rebel governance', we suggest to focus here on the continuities and discontinuities between war and post-war orders. How does 'rebel rule' transform into state domination and how does the culture of governance developed under 'rebel rule' shape post-war governance by former rebels? This panel will discuss how the symbolic and material aspects of rebel rule 'survive' the end of hostilities, especially in formerly rebel-held territories, and how this impacts long-term state formation processes.
